The Republic has again been ranked among the world's best-run 16 or so countries, scoring in the top percentile in five of six measures of governance in a World Bank study of 212 countries and territories.

In Governance Matters, 2007: Worldwide Governance Indicators 1996-2006, released yesterday in Washington, DC, World Bank researchers rate Singapore particularly strongly - as they have in earlier editions of the study - for government effectiveness (quality of policy formulation and implementation, and of the civil service) and regulatory quality (reflected in sound, market-friendly policies).

On both these indicators, Singapore obtained near-100 per cent scores, and is behind only Denmark for government effectiveness, and behind only Hong Kong for regulatory quality.

The other two indicators where Singapore ranks in the top percentile - that is, 90 per cent of countries rank below - are rule of law (public confidence in the quality of contract enforcement, the police and the courts) and political stability.
