

Slip and Fall Accidents in Grocery Stores

If you are injured in a slip and fall accident in a grocery store you need an experienced attorney on your side.

May 27, 2008 - PRLog -- Grocery stores can be dangerous places. The combination of food and household products - liquids, gels, jellies, oils, soaps, and the like - and hard tile floors can create hazardous conditions that are often impossible to detect until it's too late.

In Texas, the law says that businesses are not responsible for every accident that takes place on their premises, but only some accidents. Those situations are when: (1) the employees of the business knew about the dangerous condition that caused the accident, or (2) the employees should have known about the dangerous condition.

When, for example, a refrigerator unit at a grocery store is leaking water onto the floor, and a store employee sees the water but fails to clean it up and/or put a warning sign out to warn customers, and if a customer then slips in the water and becomes injured, that situation falls within the first category of accidents for which the business may be held responsible.
