Dated: Aug 14, 2008

Peter Monroe loves listening to Sandro Botticelli. He is also knowledgeable in the field of Fine Arts and can easily carry a conversation or two about the Modern Masters.

Studio City, California – It was a breezy Saturday afternoon when Peter Monroe showed up for an interview in a chic restaurant. Looking dapper in a suit, one can easily mistake him for a fashion magazine cover model than someone working in the field of Neurosurgery.

After the usual exchange of pleasantries, one will notice that this guy comes across as someone witty yet possess a certain mystery that is waiting to be unraveled.

He discussed his plans in detail. It is evident in the way he laid them out that he means business and is determined to reach his goals.

Peter Monroe wants you!

This is the message that this 28-year-old Neurosurgeon from Studio City, California shouts to the world as he plans to expand his social network.

When asked to further expound on this, the ever smiling doctor answered, “I want to reach out to people who share my interests, learn what is on their minds. In this process, I not only seek to develop friendships but it also helps me to improve myself in the process.”

He mentioned that modern technology is essential to enable him to reach his goal in reaching out to more people. The power of the internet makes social networking a breeze and it reaches people in some corners of the globe who he would otherwise not be able to get in touch of given a different set up.

He is also described by colleagues as a perfectionist, a trait typical for those born under the sign of Virgo. Peter however, was quick to point out that this trait proved to be essential in his chosen field. He mentioned too that he really is no Mr. Perfect as his wife attests.

He is well-built and attributes this to weekly visits to the gym, healthy diet and engaging in his favorite sport of baseball during his free time. Peter used to dream of playing pro baseball but he said that a knee injury prevented him from pursuing his dream. Besides, he fell in love with his profession and wouldn't exchange it for any other.

Peter Monroe loves listening to Sandro Botticelli. He is also knowledgeable in the field of Fine Arts and can easily carry a conversation or two about the Modern Masters.

A staunch Republican, he would engage others in friendly debates on the party's merits. Peter Monroe said that it will be better if he can network with fellow Republicans so as to immediately have a common point of interest. “It beats getting into fist fights over some political affiliations,” joked Monroe.
