Romance is big business, but are romance compatibility reports really effective? eHarmony has a very detailed matching system that is probably more hype than help.

A new blog has been launched that will delve into romance compatibility reports and their accuracy by contacting real people about their effectiveness.

This new blog is open to anyone who would like to contribute to the topic. Whether you're just looking for something to do, or if you wish to be a lab rat for our amusement, please click on the "contribute" link on the blog and start writing articles on the topic. If you do a good job, we just might put you on staff! In all seriousness, romance is big business and by providing insight into these type of tests and reports, we also hope to learn the secrets to finding romance ourselves.

What is the difference between making a decision about a potential partner with or without this information? Our opinion is that it's helpful but let's face it. How many people actually tell the truth on those type of things? If there was a way to test the accuracy of this information, you would probably get real value from the answers, but maybe not in the way some people think. For example, just because you know something about someone does not mean they are always going to think that way. I change my mind all the time about what I want as I get older. <http://www.freeromancecompatibilityreport.com>
