Advocacy groups and media outlets such the NY times have recently been launching articles that have negatively impacted salvia, comparing it to having comparable effects to LSD or "magic mushrooms". One should note that these comments and so called "facts" are largely being based upon fictitious arguments that lack any valid scientific proof for having negative health impacts.

Upon further investigation into the NY times so-called sources for its 'nay' sayers it was linked to a group of mother's who infamously known to be against everything that's not water, and using the argument that their children will suffer if salvia remains a legal substance in the United States.

For the most part the NY times in their most recent article published on September 8, 2008 entitled "Popularity of a Hallucinogen May Thwart Its Medical Uses" have made amends with their previous much more pro-ban Salvia articles. However they continue to utilize several sources of unreliable youtubers that describe their experiences as out of this world and make a complete mockery out of Salvia, entitling their videos "Jackass" or "Up in smoke".
