For many marketers, a program or piece of software that allows them to bookmark content to multiple sites automatically is a necessity.

For many marketers, a program or piece of software that allows them to bookmark content to multiple sites automatically is a necessity, however in the past most systems have proved to be either expensive, difficult to use, ineffective or a combination of all three.

However, all that has recently changed with the inception of a new service by one web promotion company.

uSocial.net – famed for selling votes on social bookmarking sites like Digg and Yahoo! Buzz – have recently launched a new services which they say is one of a kind. Their new automatic social bookmarking service allows users to submit to over 200 sites at once, though what makes it different is that the company have made it totally hands-off.

“We’ve used some of the systems out there before for our own business and despite the fact they all saved time, some still took around an hour to submit which meant sitting in front of the program inputting captcha codes,” said CEO of uSocial Leon Hill. “I thought that if we could create something which was truly hands-off that businesses would flock to it and it didn’t take long until we designed something that fit the bill.”

Servicing 235 sites at the time of this writing, the new system allows businesses to simply email their links in and then uSocial do the rest.

“All that’s required is that our clients send us an email daily, or hourly if they wish, and we do the rest,” continued Hill. “We go to work submitting for them and once done, we send them a confirmation email to let them know everything has been sorted out.”

For $47 per month, clients are allowed unlimited usage of the service and can submit as many links as they like.
