

Can You Claim For Your Asthma as an Industrial Disease?

Asthma can develop as a consequence of your working conditions; something which is known as occupational asthma

Sept. 3, 2009 - PRLog -- If you develop occupational asthma through no fault of your own and if your employer was negligent in exposing you to factors that caused your asthma, then you may be able to claim compensation for the condition as an industrial disease; and you can get help and advice on your potential claim at Claim-Easy.co.uk.

Asthma is a condition in which there is irritation in the airways caused by a number of different irritants from allergies, physical exertion and smoke to chemicals, varying from sufferer to sufferer. Symptoms include coughing, wheezing and difficulty breathing; severe asthma attacks can be fatal. Someone can be born with asthma, or develop it in later life for no known particular reason. However, one known reason behind developing asthma in later life is through poor working conditions. Should your work involve exposure to asthmagens or respiratory sensitisers (which can be as disparate as harsh chemicals and simple flour) and your employer not provide adequate ventilation, respiratory protective equipment, etc., and you develop asthma as a result, then you could claim for your occupational asthma as an industrial disease.

Work-related asthma differs from occupational asthma in that the sufferer has had the condition since birth or childhood but finds that conditions at work significantly worsen their asthma symptoms and bring on hypersensitivity, leading to increasingly frequent asthma attacks which are triggered more easily.

Whether you suffer from occupational asthma or work-related asthma, if you believe your asthma is directly related to your working conditions and think this could be the basis of an industrial disease compensation claim, then speak to one of the experienced team at Claim-Easy for advice on what to do next.
