As we have evolved into an industrial and consumer driven society, electric guitar tone quality has been sacrificed to mass production, cheap components and poor workmanship. In an effort to discover a specific sound and tone in a guitar and inspire an era of music's legendary guitarists and performers (such as Eric Clapton, Ted Nugent and BB king); Eddie Van Halen spent 35 years painstakingly self engineering the famous Wolfgang guitar.

In order to assist professionals and beginner electric guitar (ists) in their personal quest for the playing style (called "tapping") that Van Halen made famous; a website with everything about the wolfgang electric guitars by Peavey has been created.

Fueled by those fans and dedicated rockers who love the unique melodies and rifts that poured out of Eddie Van Halen's handcrafted (originally only for and by himself) black guitar; this new website is dedicated. The history of vintage Van Halen guitars goes all the way back to the early days of the rock group Van Halen; when a little known Eddie Van Halen and his brother Alex formed a band. Eddie (known to his friends and fans as EVH) was continuously seeking the perfect electric guitar tone and sound.

His self taught musician and guitar skills led EVH to discover that utilizing different wood types in crafting the guitar made a distinguishable difference in the overall guitar sound. His (EVH) ear was so well tuned; EVH could hear subtle changes in the sound whenever Peavey guitar centers altered any production procedures without his prior notification or permission.

Development of a guitar worthy of producing and acceptable for EVH to endorse would not come to fruition until 1997, after the birth of Eddie's son Wolfgang. Originally the guitar was available in only a few colors (six total) including Ivory, black and four maple colored quilt pattern variations. Eddie originally played a signature black electric guitar while playing professionally and touring.

After years of design and engineering; the Peavey guitar is available in over thirty custom color models.
