By Leon Hill

Dated: Dec 31, 2009

In the world of marketing on Twitter, many businesses have earned big bucks just using this site alone. For example, a recent case study is Dell's outlet store who have taken in more than $2 million in two years alone.

While this may be great news for large businesses, for smaller enterprises the problem is always the same; gaining the right amount of Twitter followers to really make marketing efforts on this social media site worthwhile.

Enter social media marketing company uSocial.net who claim to be able to help any business go from nothing on Twitter to earning big bucks.

"We are able to deliver up to 100,000 Twitter followers to any account within a few months," said uSocial CEO Leon Hill. "Not only that but clients can target them to their needs."

The service allows clients to purchase followers in packages starting at 1,000 and can be tailored to each individual's requirements.

"The great thing about this is that in the past, businesses have spent countless marketing dollars and effort getting someone to do this for them. Now that we have this service available, we're cutting down marketing times considerably." Said Hill.

The new service can be found by going to http://usocial.net/twitter_marketing, or for more information you can contact uSocial directly through their website.

So, is Twitter marketing the next big thing? Only time will tell.
