Every household gets excited about arrival of a new puppy. But it also means there is a lot for you to do and a lot more for him/her to learn. The young puppy is totally dependent on your guidance and leadership to fit into the human, domesticated world around him. How you guide him during this puppyhood determines his character, temperament and behavior habits which will last his lifetime. In essence, whether your puppy becomes a social outcast or a trusted member of society is completely in your hands.

One question related to pets, asked most often is – How to train a puppy? The answer is not all fun and games. We all love the puppy despite its cries, barks, digs and pooping. The puppy just needs some direction and boundaries to follow. Early puppy socialization and puppy training are keys to making them have a thriving life as adults. Hence tasks like puppy house training, crate training, leash training and obedience need to be addressed from the very start. Its important to have a lot of patience while training a puppy. Also giving him encouragement and rewards as he learns, keeping the training session short helps him learn faster.

Another problem faced by the pet owners is addressing the pet's need to relieve itself. All known potty training have shortcomings in them. So the puppy housebreaking method solves the messy problem of training the dog to go to the toilet indoors. Even a puppy trained to go to the door at potty time is helpless as it cant open the door. The dog holding it back at those times can be bad for health. This torture can trigger separation anxiety in the pet if it associates being left at home with being unable to potty. The best solution is to housebreak your puppy early. Its good to teach them the options they have for pee and potty.
