

How a Debt Settlement Letter Should Look Like

Knowing what a settlement letter should look like is absolutely key if you are going to write a good one. In order to actually succeed with this type of writing, you need to at least have some experience with it.

March 11, 2010 - PRLog -- Whether that comes through writing letters or through reading examples, you need to at least be familiar with the style that is required. A debt settlement letter has to have a very specific style and a specific layout in order to be successful. Since it is official business writing, it needs to be treated as such, with the emphasis on providing a clear and concise idea.

Natalia Osorio Editor of the "Best Debt Settlement Companies" website -- <http://www.BestDebtSettlementCompanies.org> -- pointed out;

“...The beginning of the letter should be very formal. It should address the credit card providers directly and start out with the primary point of the letter. Don't be around the bush and don't waste your time (or theirs) with any details that are not absolutely necessary. In the first paragraph, inform the creditors that you are writing in regards to your debt situation. Let it be known right up front that the letter is an attempt to settle the debt with them directly. This is important, because this letter will be used throughout the proceeding as a basis for negotiation...”

After letting them know your purpose for writing the letter, your actual offer must be included. Somewhere in the first part of the letter, lay out the terms that you are willing to take. This will include the amount of money that you can offer to settle the entire debt and also how many installments that will need to be. Most settlements come in the form of one lump sum payment, but some people can negotiate a deal where they make the payments in as many as six installments. The details the payment and the terms should be given in pure, distinct form. Don't leave anything to chance and include all applicable details.

“...The most important thing is to include in the settlement letter the fact that you are looking to settle the entire debt. Let them know that this is not just an attempt to work out a payment plan. Instead, you are looking to take care of the whole thing and end your relationship with them. This will come across as strong and it is necessary if you are going to be on solid footing in your negotiation with them...” N. Osorio added.
