Nov. 1, 2010 - PRLog -- Kinnelon, NJ – LinkedIn is more than a place to post resumes for small and medium businesses. It's a vibrant social network for business professionals to broaden their and their companies' visibility online. Participation on an individual and company basis represents an important element of business marketing.

LinkedIn is a professional social network launched in 2003 with over 70 million members in 200 countries and all 7 continents. Given that its members are well-educated – close to ¾ of members have college degrees – and represent a multitude of businesses, including Fortune 500 companies, participation offers the means to gain valuable business perspective.

“Many small and medium businesses aren't taking full advantage of the rich resources available on LinkedIn,” says Christine B. Whittemore, chief simplifier of Simple Marketing Now, a marketing consultancy focused on helping organizations make their marketing work harder for them. “LinkedIn extends traditional in-person networking to additional dimensions: in time as you connect with people with whom you share professional history, geographically as you connect beyond your immediate vicinity and also exponentially as you establish connections beyond the immediate people you know.”

LinkedIn profiles are readily visible on search engines making them an important element of a small and medium business' overall marketing strategy. “It's important to fully complete your LinkedIn profile. As you do so, you should be deliberate about the key words to include so they coincide with ones relevant to your business' adds Whittemore.
