July 26, 2008 - PRLog -- Think about the story you're living right now. Who wrote it? Did you consciously decide to create the reality you're living now, or was it mainly shaped by your self, parents, friends, spouse, school, or the media? If you don't like the story you're living, then change the perception. Envision how you'd write the next chapter of your story. Think about the story you're living right now. Who wrote it?

Better yet, actually sit down and write it. Focus your perception on creating a new reality, one where you are in charge of the story of your life.

What Others are Saying

"I read hundreds of books that deal with the subject and context covered in this book. To my joy, though, Candace House has delivered a most enjoyable read with a 'fresh' perspective.

Too often I am disappointed by many authors who have either 'missed the point' of their subject or have simply rehashed the thoughts of others. I do sincerely enjoy reading a 'fresh' perspective. I have truly enjoyed reading Candace House' new book You Frame Your World By The Words You Say.

Book Summary

Candace has really written a winner. All of her books are super because of their clarity and easy to grasp concepts. She has the ability to relate thoughts in a manner that induces understanding. This book, You Frame Your World By The Words You Say, is an adventure into the core values that help each individual sculpt his world. We are warned about the power of the tongue and encouraged to use it properly. As she points out, we have the ability and the power to speak life or to speak death into our lives and the lives of others. It is a matter of how we perceive ourselves, the world around us and our relationship to the Creator of this world."
