"It was obvious to me that he [Mark B. Baer, Esq.] instinctively has the ability, and desire, to look for the best path for his clients," said Pamela Edwards-Swift in her article.

June 11, 2010 - PRLog -- Pamela Edwards-Swift's article entitled, "Family Law Attorneys Can Make Or Break Your Case" was published in the June 2010 edition of West Coast Magazine. I just had lunch with Pamela Edwards-Swift on June 11, 2010 and she gave me a copy of the magazine because she told me that I am the other attorney referenced in the article."

The following are salient points from the article:

"I recently had a case in my office that the other attorney and I were able to work out amicably, just with telephone conversations. We never met in person throughout the entire case. The attorney was very pleasant to work with and we were able to save our clients a lot of money by avoiding court appearances.

Just a few weeks ago, I had the pleasure of meeting that attorney in person, when we coincidentally signed up for the same continuing education course. (Although this was not your typical continuing education course.) This was a three-day intense collaborative training course. It was the other attorney's first collaborative course, and my millionth (or at least it seems that way). However, what struck me was how he conducted himself throughout the entire course, and how he had worked with an attorney before he had the collaborative training. It was obvious to me that he instinctively has the ability, and desire, to look for the best path for his clients.

This same attorney called me the other day to discuss a thought he had concerning the current problems with family law and how the attorneys play a key part in the outcome of their cases. Specifically, he was concerned about the mental state of the attorneys and how their own personalities can interfere with resolving cases. The attorney's own personality, he said, was pivotal in potentially having a negative effect on the people they serve and the children involved.

My colleague make a great point. The more I do this, the more convinced I am that choosing the right attorney is one of the most important decisions you can make."
