

Cost of Living, Margin and Credit Has Severely Impacted American Buying Power

On a recent episode of the Wealth Transfer show, financial analyst Terry Sacka, AAMS provided some insightful data highlighting the gaps between wages, cost of living, margin and debt in America.

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. - May 31, 2018 - PRLog -- Mr. Sacka opened with the statement, "We're not paying attention to our portfolio and finances the way we should. We are programmed to go into debt, take out credit, and finance loans. We look at our wealth as something we put into these and other fiat paper currency systems."

As the show proceeded Mr. Sacka displayed several charts citing evidence conclusive to this fact. According to data from the Financial Industry Regulatory Authority (FINRA), the Stock Market Margin Debt had surpassed over 650 billion dollars in January of 2018 at its peak and settled just below that in the last couple of months. This number is a staggering more than double the 300 billion dollars in debt back in 2012.

On the show he also displayed charts detailing the debt used to maintain standard of living which displays the gap between wages and the cost of living. He also broke down other financial charts with insightful data which can be seen in the video below.

Mr. Sacka went on to say, "If we really diversify properly, which personally to me is a third to a half of our net worth into tangible assets and the rest into paper."
