"It took me about two years to find the company I wanted to partner with, says Cliff Dew. Anybody can project video on a wall but what sets Marin and his team apart from all the others is that they meticulously explore what the architecture's facade can bring to the experience. With laser scanning and compelling storytelling, they can actually make it appear as if the building itself is living and breathing. It does not matter whether it's an interior or exterior surface. When I saw their grand prize winning entree at the Festival of Lights in Berlin last October, that's who I went after."

"When Cliff contacted us, the timing could not have been better because we had been looking for ways to penetrate the United States Market, recalls Marin. So, after a few get acquainted calls and seeing that Cliff and his team already produce very good 3D animation, and they knew and understood production it was the perfect fit for us. An I agree with what Cliff believes about the fantastic opportunities that are available in the U.S. Projecting mapping can be seen all over Europe but not so much in America. From new advertising venues to museums, to events, there are limitless possibilities."

You can create tremendous buzz around your marketing campaigns. Companies are beginning to understand the potential rewards of telling their brand stories on magnificent architectural facades. Using these massive structures as a canvas to create compelling, uber-engaging content is the "WOW" to delivering a truly immersive crowd experience. The impact always exceeds the event! it, they share it, they talk and post about it!
